Executive summary and introduction countries, like France, that invested almost nothing directly, and instead relied almost exclusively on fostering a competitive environment. 1. 4. 3 In Europe, substantial effort has been devoted to delimiting when government investment, both national and municipal, is justified and will not risk crowding out private investment Because public investment risks crowding out market investment, we review current decisions by the European Union on the proper guidelines for when and how public investment is appropriate. In the context of considering municipal investments, like Amsterdams CityNet, and country-level investments, the European Commission has studied both specific cases and the general policy question under an explicit mandate to limit state interventions that could undermine the development of a common market in goods and services. Here we review that experience, and the new European guidelines, issued September 17th, 2009. These guidelines are a formal decision of the European Commission on two kinds of state and municipal investments. The first is aimed to achieve universal access to first generation broadband technologies. This decision refers to similar problems, and takes a broadly similar approach to, funding for access to unserved and underserved areas as taken under the stimulus funding in the U. S. The second is intended to speed deployment of next generation broadband technologies, so as to harvest the anticipated social and economic benefits of the next generation transition. On this subject, the European ruling holds that government funding can be appropriate even where there are two present facilities-based incumbents, offering triple-play services, including 24Mbps broadband service, as long...
