Excerpt: . . . 11 that I think adds special urgency to the Advisory Committees recommendations is the new demography of college age students. The Census Bureau projects that there will be 20 percent more 18-to 24-year-olds over the next decade, and this cohort will look very different from previous generations of college age students. It will be ethnically much more diverse, and the fastest growth will come from groups in the U. S. that have traditionally been poorer on average than the general population. Substantially more financial aid will be needed just to sustain current levels of post-secondary participation. But removing financial barriers is just part of the challenge, as has been noted. We need complimentary strategies to equalize college opportunities. Many factors influence an individuals chances of college: prior schooling, academic achievement, family and community attitudes, awareness of opportunities, as well as ability to pay. For low-and moderate-income students, affordability is intertwined with a host of other variables rooted in culture, environment, and social conditions. Of all of the things that influence...
